I am looking to start accepting Bitcoin as my primary business model to make some money to support my family. But Bitcoin's price is based on supply and demand. If I run a business accepting Bitcoin, and there is no other businesses doing the same that means the supply is "fixed". So I can assume that my cost of accepting this currency will be zero. Why do merchants not realize that they could legally accept Bitcoin? A: My personal opinion and what I have been told: A lot of people do realize. Most people don't, however, know that they can legally do so. It's not really knowledge that is hard to come by, it's knowledge that can be officially provided in a way that doesn't undermine the entire ethos of bitcoin. It's the same reason why there isn't a de-facto top-level domain for Bitcoin, there is for.org and.com, so the existence of.bit is not a threat to the validity of bitcoin as a name. The biggest problem is that Bitcoin doesn't have a legal distinction between the official, recognized currency of a country and it's own currency. That's why it would require educational outreach. What's New In?

How to get the icons The icons come in both transparent and 48x48 pixel PNG image format. I have packaged them in zip files. To get the zip files, please see the Download section for a direct link. Please note that the transparent icons have a 48x48 size as well, so if you need transparent icons you need to download both the regular and transparent ones.
