The paddy rice is one of the most important crops in many countries, including Japan, China, and Korea. Most Japanese farmers in Hokkaido use small and polyculture farming systems and cultivate hybrid rice under rain-fed conditions. In the spring or early summer, the field is first ploughed and then seedbed is formed with a rice seed drill. In this field, most commonly used paddy rice varieties, categorized by their flowering times and grain sizes, are grown. In Hokkaido, some farmers plant other crops after the rice is matured and ripened. The paddy rice is sown in late March or early April, usually in a paddy field with a four-layer ridged sowing, because rice plants grow more vigorously in fields covered with a four-layer ridged sowing. Rice seedlings can be transplanted at 3 days after the ploughing. At that time, when the temperature is below 10°C, the soil is cold and water is abundant, the soil is very hard and easily causes breakage. The soil is, however, more than 6-7cm deep and well drained, and the field is occupied by canola, so the application of soil nutrients is a strong possibility. Before the seedlings emerge from the soil surface, the fertilizer products are applied either through broadcasting or through a drip-line. Seedlings are nursed in a nursery field. At the time of transplanting, when seedlings, which were transplanted in a nursery field, grow to the six-leaf stage (3-4 weeks after transplanting), the seedlings are transplanted to the paddy fields.

After seedlings have been transplanted, the quantity of fertilizer products is much less than when the seedlings are grown in the nursery field. After the seedlings mature, rice seed drill sowing, and fertilizer are applied every 7 days or 10 days. Rice seeds are spread to 6 to 7 cm depth on the soil surface, three rice seeds per hill, and four hills per line. Sowing is completed from middle of June to middle of July.
