And yet, those same people would probably drop everything to make a single special order by hand. You may think that someone who is so talented would have no trouble finding a new job in the creative industry. However, for creatives who work in very low volume or niche markets, once he/she can't find work, that can create a downward spiral. If demand is less than supply, simply put, it can become a competitive advantage. By showcasing their work online, creatives can raise their profile and leverage the power of the internet.

You know what allows me to write code that's quick and easy to maintain? Writing code that's clean and readable, rather than haphazard and cluttered. Writing code that's designed-in so I never have to think about it and end up writing horrible spaghetti code. Writing code that is never out of date because I have a code repository. Writing software that has reasonable documentation and is well-commented so that I can just copy/paste a snippet of code when I want to use it.
