As featured on the front page of Photoshop.com last month, the new "Share for Reviews" button makes file sharing easier than ever. Click this button on the application's home screen to begin sharing a file for review either by giving your own feedback or letting other users provide feedback by checking a box. If you later decide to cancel, you can choose the option to restore the file to the version you shared from. With Share Prod cuts down on the number of people needed to proof a file and speeds up the quality control process by eliminating the need to upload multiple physical files to Photoshop.com and editing one file at a time. Simplification pages and the simplified Viewport pane give you an immediate impression of what's changed, and less clutter makes using Photoshop easier. You might take some getting used to Lightroom's new UI, but even once you've done, it makes Photoshop's interface more efficient. For the most part, it looks like Photoshop will be getting mixed reviews. Either it costs too much to compete right now with the simple, free tools that more and more people use or you have to spend too much time on learning and using it. Those are the questions I'm getting asked all the time now. I know these decisions come with caveats, like I said, "Adobe Photoshop CC 2014's interface is more efficient than Lightroom 5's interface. " That said, Photoshop has always been a blockbuster application. When it arrives in the Mac App Store, most Mac users will probably upgrade to it. As far as I'm concerned, it will always carry the legacy of its size and glory, but Small Business setting is a plus, since it's easy enough for even a new user to get started.
